If the man charged with a crime is found responsible, there still remains the problem of sentence. Is he a person likely to benefit by the help and supervision of a Probation Officer, or does he need imprisonment? If the latter, shall it be for a definite term, or shall it be indeterminate so that the man may have some reason to make good while in jail. These may seem to be matters in which the judiciary alone are concerned and for which legal science will prescribe the treatment. But wise judges in Chicago, Boston, New York and Philadelphia welcome the aid of the Psychologist who has time for an extended examination and acquaintance with the individual outside the court room. In most courts the person usually found to need special Psychological treatment is the defendant. In Domestic Relations Courts, where matters of dispute involve husband and wife, or parents and children, and where any one of the group may bring suit, and any one may be at fault, it is frequently the complainant rather than the defendant who needs the service of the Psychologist. For example, a woman may suddenly become careless about the house and the care of the children, and the husband annoyed to desperation may desert his home. An examination may disclose the fact that the wife s carelessness indicates the onset of a serious mental breakdown. In this case the judge, instead of punishing...
