Not illustrated. 1895 Excerpt: . easily imparts oxygen to other substances; sulphur, mixed with six times its weight of PbO ., may be ignited by friction; hence this oxide is a common ingredient in lucifer-match compositions. Its oxidising property is frequently turned to account in the laboratory; for example, in absorbing sulphur dioxide from gaseous mixtures by converting it into sulphate of lead; $\text{PbO} + \text{SO}_2 = \text{PbSO}_4$. Dioxide of lead is not dissolved by dilute acids, and has no basic properties, although certain salts of the type PbX_4 are known; it is even sometimes called plumbic anhydride, for it acts upon potassium hydroxide, yielding potassium plumbate (K_2PbO_3), which has been crystallised from an alkaline solution, but is decomposed by pure water. Lead dioxide evolves O_2 from HCl when heated, and gives, at first, a brown solution (containing PbCl_4) which yields a brown precipitate with ammonia, but if the solution be boiled till all the Cl is expelled, it becomes colourless PbCl_2 , and gives a white precipitate with ammonia. PbO is converted into PbO_2 , by ozone and by hydrogen peroxide. Lead hydroxide, Pb(OH)_2 , has not been obtained, but $\text{Pb(OH)}_2 \cdot \text{PbO}$ is formed as a white precipitate when air and water, free from CO_2 , attack lead. The same substance is precipitated by alkalies from solutions of lead salts. It becomes PbO when heated to 145°C . The compound $\text{Pb(OH)}_2 \cdot 2\text{PbO}$ crystallises in octahedra from a solution of basic lead acetate mixed with ammonia. Lead nitrate, $\text{Pb(NO}_3)_2$, crystallises in white octahedra from a solution...
